LYMAN BROUGHTON

He Was a Pioneer of Boston Township.

(Special Correspondence.)
Peninsula, Aug. 20.—Lyman Broughton, a pioneer of Boston township, died at Peninsula, Wednesday, Aug. 13, after a lingering illness. He was born in Wells, Vermont, and came to this place while a small boy and has lived here ever since.

He was married to Effie Amelia Whitney, April 8, 1852. He leaves a wife, eight children, 23 grandchildren and three great grandchildren to mourn his loss.

He was honest and upright in all his dealings and no one ever went to him for help, no matter what the cause, if worthy, and came away empty handed.

The funeral was held at the home of the deceased on Friday, Aug. 15, and was attended by a large concourse of friends and neighbors. His four sons acted as pallbearers. The floral offerings were many and beautiful.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Johnson, an Episcopal minister of Hudson.

It Needs a Tonic.

There are times when your liver needs a tonic. Don't give purgatives that grip and weaken. DeWitt's Little Early Risers expel all poison from the system and act as a tonic to the liver. W. Scott, 531 Highland ave., Milton, Pa., says: "I have carried DeWitt's Little Early Risers with me for several years and would not be without them." Small and easy to take. Purely vegetable. They never gripe or dis-tress.

SCHWAB'S PLUNGE IN SOCIETY DID MORE HARM THAN GOOD

Steel Magnate Made the Show of a Nabob

Old New Yorkers Stood Aghast to See His Display.

If some of Mr. Schwab's friends and business associates are to be believed, then he is to do no more than to take a vacation that may last until frost comes, and is to be spent for the most part at some of the health resorts of Europe, says "Holland" in his New York letter to the Philadelphia Press. From others come intimations that his business career is interrupted, certainly for an indefinite period, and it may be for good. In addition to these there are those who intimate that Mr. Schwab's retirement may be due, as his recent collapse was probably due, to the nervous strain caused by a knowledge of friction and a lack of support on the part of a considerable element among the stockholders of the steel corporation. There is no doubt that a minority that was by no means small did not look with favor upon the proposition recently checked by the Vice Chancellor of New Jersey, involving the exchange of preferred stock for bonds and the payment of a large sum of money to an underwriting syndicate for financing that plan. The objection was not outspoken. It did not develop at the meetings of the corporation. It manifested itself chiefly by orders given to the brokers by those who were dissatisfied to sell their stock.

Aside from this difference of opinion it is not known that any disagreement on the part of the stockholders as to the directing of the corporation has prevailed, at least of importance enough to occasion the president and the directors any embarrassment. And yet probably no man upon whom great business responsibility has been placed and to whom great opportunities have come has been more closely watched, both in his business and also in his personal life, than has been the case of Mr. Schwab. It would not be exactly correct to say that he has been spied upon. There were no antagonisms, no great jealousies that made it worth while closely to scrutinize Mr. Schwab so as to discover if there were something in his personal or business life that might be used to his disadvantage.

But he came to New York with a reputation unmatched in many respects by that brought to this city by any other who had gained wealth and authority in the industrial and commercial world. It was something like the reputation, both personal and business which James R. Keene brought to New York from California 25 years ago. Keene's reputation was that of a master speculative strategist; that of a man who had possessed the foresight, or the industry that makes foresight possible, that enabled him to see the collapse of the big bonanza properties and to take advantage of the impending bursting of that bubble. Mr. Keene brought also to New York certain eccentricities of personal life. They were harmless enough, but they were of the character that justified jesting.

Possibly had Mr. Schwab taken counsel from the experience of Mr. Keene he might have been spared this early collapse. He is just about the age that Mr. Keene was when he came so perilously near paralysis of the brain or complete nervous overthrow.

New York did not know Mr. Schwab excepting vaguely as some distant individuality that reflected the great vigor and intellect of Andrew Carnegie. With the organization of the United States steel trust and the election of Mr. Schwab to its presidency, there came a sudden and dazzling revelation of the abilities and personality of this young man. No one needed to say of him that in the iron and steel trade, at least that part of it in which the Carnegie interests had been conspicuous, he was a past master, an acknowledged expert, a brilliant, industrious, and intuitive business genius. Naturally, all the romance and fascination that are associated with the life of one who from the humblest of beginnings by his own abilities and grasping of opportunities gains wealth and influence intensified the interest in Mr. Schwab.

It is probable that the financiers of the higher order were wondering whether he had possessed not only the technical knowledge and experience that enabled him to serve as president of the Carnegie corporation, but whether he were also gifted with that broad, comprehensive business statesmanship so to speak that would enable him as successfully to direct a corporation that was both National and international in its scope and purpose as he had directed the, comparatively speaking, smaller corporations identified by Mr. Carnegie's name. There had not been at the time of Mr. Schwab's collapse, an entirely satisfactory answer to the financiers who had, half curiously, half anxiously, been asking one another the question. In other words, Mr. Schwab had not been fully tested, and when this is said it is not meant that his career had been unsatisfactory in its broader relations to our commercial and industrial and financial life, but to say that it was not unsatisfactory is by no means to admit that Mr. Schwab had as yet been ranked with the high order of business statesmanship of which Mr. Morgan, Mr. Stillman, Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Hill are such conspicuous examples.

Ordinarily it would be an impropriety, if not an impertinence, to make public report of the private life of any of those who are prominent in industrial or financial affairs, or any other, in fact. But when certain features of the private life of a business man who has become conspicuous and influential seem to afford opportunity for obtaining judgment as to the staying qualities, the moral fiber, the self-restraint and equipoise of one upon whom many responsibilities rest and whose mistakes might be followed by business calamity, then he cannot be privileged, at least as to that part of his private life which does not escape the observation of the public.

Therefore, it was not only natural, but in one sense justifiable, that there should have been considerable comment at the manner of life which Mr. Schwab at once began to lead when he came to New York. Men of great wealth and of wide experience and of long residence in New York not complainingly, but suggestively spoke of those luxurious apartments at the most garish and sensational of our hotels where Mr. Schwab had installed himself and his family. His private service, his elaborate entertainment, his reception there, while he was at his late breakfast, of men plunging into the thick of affairs and who had been up and stirring several hours before Mr. Schwab was awake. His apparently ostentatious and sensational purchase of a block upon Riverside drive, contemplating the erection thereon of the most showy of New York's city homes, and various peculiarities of this character inevitably led to the suspicion that Mr. Schwab was not entirely content with the brilliant reputation, with the magnificent authority and influence, with the dazzling position as the head of the world's greatest corporation, which were already in his possession, but that he sought for what, to many of our citizens, is a cheaper, less worthy, less satisfactory sense of power, that which comes from ostentation.

It began to be said of him that he was like a nabob, that Daudet might have drawn his character of "The Nabob," had he waited until this time before writing that book, from some features of Mr. Schwab's life after he came to New York. It was not infrequently said of him that his story and that of the Count of Monte Cristo differed only in this, that one was real and the other was romance.

While there was no diminution of the respect or of the acknowledgment of those remarkable powers that brought Mr. Schwab from poverty to one of the proudest positions in the business world, nevertheless, among experienced men here there was wonder whether in this life that was apart from his business career there was not to be discovered the Achilles heel.

The wonder is whether Mr. Schwab's collapse may not in part be traceable to the very impulses which led him, if not to seek, at least to adopt a manner of life in private that brought him to a consciousness in its way quite as great as that which he had obtained as a veteran of experience, both in the business and social life of New York, there would have been a firmer faith if Mr. Schwab's maintenance of the high position which the swift organization of the steel trust made it possible for him to take had there been another manner of life at least for several years after he came to New York. This view was strengthened by the sensational experiences through which Mr. Schwab passed during his brief vacation of last winter in Europe.

Our Way of Lunching
Is not by any means a good one. You may take "free" or "quick" lunch, as ninety out of every hundred busy men of sedentary habits are compelled to do, and you are on the road to having the functions of your digestive organs seriously impaired. Now, then, look for some kind of assistance. It is offered by the "St. Bernard Vegetable Pills," without question the very best medicine for all stomach and liver troubles. Purely vegetable. All druggists sell them.

A. J. Cottingham went to Washington county, Ark., to see his sister, and while there was taken with flux (dysentery) and was very bad off. He decided to try Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and was so much pleased with the prompt cure which it effected that he wrote the manufacturers a letter in praise of their medicine. Mr. Cottingham resides at Lockland, Ark. This remedy is for sale by all druggists. E. Steinhilber & Co., wholesale agents.
